The Fine Line: What a Fan Belt Can Teach Us About Resource Management in Professional Services

A Global VP of Professional Services at a major tech firm once said: “My job is to maintain the tightest possible team to provide the best services to customers.” He was under no illusions — he knew this was easy to say and hard to execute. He described the holy grail as a tool that would help him “grow professional services in a financially responsible way—you can’t just hire because everyone is fully utilized. You need to point to trends and pipeline to justify adding resources.” What professional services orgs are trying to do is complex—they’re trying to transfer force, to keep multiple parts of a system moving in sync. An interesting metaphor? A fan belt. Read the full article.

Resources and Timesheets: Your Double Engine of Growth & Compliance

Every growing enterprise strives for predictable delivery, operational efficiency, and profitability. While strategic goals are often clearly defined, execution success depends on two core drivers: how resources are deployed and how time is tracked. Resources and timesheets are not merely functional necessities. They are strategic levers. The way you allocate your workforce, monitor effort, and translate both into financial data influences utilization, cost efficiency, project velocity, and audit readiness. Yet in many organizations, these two systems are fragmented, loosely enforced, or disconnected from the broader project and financial lifecycle. This eBook aims to reset how you view these two functions—not as administrative overheads, but as growth and compliance enablers. Read the full article.

RMCP® Spotlight: Tyler Zimske

Meet Tyler Zimske, Resource Planning Manager at Resultant, our Q2 RMCP® Spotlight! Tyler shares how he transitioned from consulting into resource management after seeing firsthand the staffing and project launch challenges his team faced—and how he jumped at the opportunity to be part of the solution. He reflects on what makes a great resource manager (think business owner meets relationship builder), and how he balances work with time on the golf course and at home with his kids. Tyler also opens up about one of his biggest resource management challenges: building trust across the organization to establish the RMO, a journey that has led to meaningful improvements in efficiency and delivery.
